As SLPs head back to school this year, many are finding themselves conducting therapy remotely. Clinicians may be at a loss when it comes to developing intervention plans and finding therapy materials for their telepractice sessions. In this presentation, we will learn how to make the most of the built-in features found in most video conference platforms, how to create new, engaging and interactive activities, as well as how to adapt books and other print resources that therapists may have used previously in therapy. Additionally, clinicians will develop strategies for supporting students and planning teletherapy sessions. Multiple examples and case study examples will be given.

MEET OUR PRESENTER:

William Bolden III, MA CCC-SLP, is a project coordinator/eSLP at Kent State University. He has worked at the university for several years providing school-based speech and language services via telepractice. Additionally, he supervises graduate students as part of their clinical practicum and presents on topics related Telepractice.

William Bolden's financial disclosure is his employment at Kent State University and he receives a salary. He has no relevant non-financial disclosures.

Learner Outcomes:

Participants will be able to:

1. Identify methods for engaging and supporting students during telepractice intervention.
2. Create interactive materials for telepractice and computer-based therapy using a variety of computer-based applications (e.g. Microsoft office).
3. List methods to adapt books and other print resources for sharing through electronic video/screen sharing platforms.
4. Develop lesson plans for individual and group telepractice sessions.
